Digital technologies and Artificial Intelligence (AI) interact with diplomacy along three axes: agency, process and subject matter. This workshop will explore how digital technologies and AI impact and change the agents of diplomacy, including facilitating the participation of new actors in international debates. It will explain how diplomats and other professionals are increasingly using digital technologies and AI in securing their objectives in the international environment, and the challenges and dangers this can bring. Finally the workshop will explore the international problems that digital technologies and AI are generating, including in the context of cybersecurity and disinformation operations, and the ways in which diplomats and other professionals can use diplomacy to manage these agendas. In this context the workshop will also look at the context created by the geopolitics of digital technologies and AI. The workshop will include practical exercises which will enable the participants to practice the skills and knowledge they have acquired.

At the end of the workshop participants will be able to:

- Distinguish key issues at the intersection between diplomacy and technology;
- Explain the relation of cyberspace and geopolitics and its effects on diplomacy;
- Identify concrete ways in which digital technologies, including AI, can support diplomats and diplomacy;
- Identify the main stakeholders and issues of cyberdiplomacy;
- Understanding the opportunities and limitations of using AI in diplomacy.
