On September 25-27, 2015, the world-renowned United Nations Sustainable Development Summit was held at the United Nations Headquarters. The three-day United Nations Sustainable Development Summit on the opening day adopted the "Transforming Our World - The 2030 Agenda for Sustainable Development", which was jointly agreed by 193 Member States, covering 17 Sustainable Development Goals and 169 targets. The programmatic document will push the world on the road of sustainable development.

There is no doubt that the United Nations Sustainable Development Goals lead human society to address the three interlinked core elements of the world's future sustainable development, namely economic growth, social inclusion and environmental sustainability. As a people-centred, universally valuable, transformative and integral agenda, the new sustainable development agenda calls for action by countries around the world in key areas such as people, planet, prosperity, peace, partnership, and recognizes that poverty eradication must Go hand-in-hand with efforts to build economic growth and address a range of societal needs while tackling climate change.

With the UN's concept of sustainable development gaining popularity around the world, ESG, as the core component of the sustainable development evaluation system, has become the focus of governments and the economy and society in its theory and practice. Institutions and investors pay more attention to environmental protection, social responsibility, corporate governance and other non-financial factors, which have played an irreplaceable role in promoting.

At the same time, in the face of the opportunities and challenges of the global ESG wave, the vast majority of government departments, enterprises, institutions and investment institutions in China generally lack professional talents when carrying out related work. salient issues. In order to solve this practical contradiction between demand and supply, after arduous resource integration and course module polishing, the Shanghai International Training Center of the United Nations Institute for Training and Research launched the United Nations Sustainable Development ESG Advanced Seminar, striving to promote the concept of sustainable development in China's economy and society. make a due contribution to the results
