Good governance is the foundation of prosperous, inclusive and peaceful societies, where human rights are effectively promoted and protected through strong and accountable institutions. Public policies are key instruments through which governments respond to societal needs, set priorities, and translate principles, legislative frameworks and commitments into concrete actions that affect individuals and communities.

A sound understanding of the public policy cycle, from identifying needs and formulating responses to adoption, implementation, monitoring and evaluation, is essential to achieving effective policy outcomes. This also requires an understanding of inclusion and diversity, including how different groups experience policies and how their needs, perspectives and strengths can be reflected in policymaking.

Contemporary societies face complex and interconnected challenges, including socio-economic inequalities, political polarisation, climate change, digital divides, and barriers to equitable access to rights and services. Addressing these challenges requires policies that are evidence-informed, participatory, accountable and aligned with human rights and sustainable development commitments. Inclusive approaches are therefore essential to ensuring that policies respond to diverse realities and contribute to more equitable societies.

As a contribution to this endeavor, the United Nations Institute for Training and Research (UNITAR) has developed the online blended training "PUBLIC POLICY FOUNDATIONS AND INCLUSIVE PRACTICES" Fostering Knowledge for Responsive Decisions and Lasting Impact drawing on its expertise in training and research. It seeks to strengthen the knowledge, skills and attitudes needed to design, implement and evaluate people-centred, rights-based and evidence-informed policies and actions. Through capacity development, learning solutions and experience sharing, UNITAR supports professionals and institutions in addressing current and emerging governance challenges and contributing to peaceful, just and inclusive societies.

The blended training consists of two self-paced online courses complemented by online lectures. It places particular emphasis on inclusive public policy as a foundation for good governance, connecting the fundamentals of policymaking with their practical application. Participants will explore key dimensions of inclusive governance, human rights and diverse groups, as well as emerging policy challenges related to human mobility, gender, disability, digital inclusion, climate change and food security. By combining conceptual knowledge with practical perspectives, the training aims to strengthen participants' ability to engage constructively in policy processes and contribute to more inclusive decisions and sustainable outcomes for individuals, communities and society as a whole.

E-LEARNING COURSES

Course 1 — "Fundamentals of Public Policy," Fostering Knowledge for Good Governance Decisions

About the Course

This course introduces participants to fundamental features that underpin public policy. It emphasizes how governments identify societal needs, set priorities, prepare and implement measures, and evaluate outcomes to achieve effective governance. By exploring the core elements of the policy cycle, learners gain insight into how policies are developed, implemented, and assessed to address social, economic, and environmental challenges.

The course highlights the importance of evidence-based decision-making, inclusivity, and accountability as central pillars of sound policy. Participants will learn how policies can shape equitable access to services, strengthen institutions, and enhance public trust. Foundational knowledge in public policy equips learners to understand the dynamics between policy goals, stakeholders, and institutional capacities, providing a basis for informed decision-making in governance contexts.

By focusing on the essentials, this course lays the groundwork for understanding how public policy translates legislative frameworks, ideas and principles into actions that positively impact communities and society as a whole. Within this context, UNITAR plays a key role in supporting different stakeholders to strengthen good governance, including their interlinkages with public policies. Mainstreaming knowledge in these fields pursues the transformation of discriminatory social institutions, laws, cultural norms, and community practices.

Course 2 — "Public Policy for Inclusive Governance," Inclusive Decisions, Lasting Impact.

About the Course

Good governance is the foundation of prosperous, inclusive, and peaceful societies, where human rights are effectively promoted and protected through strong institutions. Yet persistent challenges remain in all countries, as they face increasingly complex issues, including political polarization, socio-economic inequalities, the negative impacts of climate change, and digital divides, which strain institutional capacity, weaken responsiveness, and erode public trust.

As underscored in United Nations resolutions and documents, common challenges persist across regions, such as weak institutional capacity, limited accountability and redress, corruption, exclusion of marginalized groups, and difficulties in translating public policies into tangible outcomes. At the same time, these challenges also present opportunities, such as digital technologies improving service delivery and transparency, inclusive policymaking strengthening social cohesion, and institutional reforms rebuilding trust between governments and citizens.

Within this context, UNITAR plays a key role in supporting different stakeholders to strengthen good governance, including their inter-linkages with public policies, human mobility, disabilities, ageing, gender, and frontier issues, including climate change, digital technologies and food security. Mainstreaming knowledge in these fields pursues the transformation of discriminatory social institutions, laws, cultural norms, and community practices.
